Los Angeles County District Attorney Jackie Lacey announced today that a bill she sponsored would provide vital immigration assistance to foreign nationals victimized by juvenile offenders.

"This bill gives undocumented crime victims access to the same immigration considerations as other crime victims throughout the United States, regardless of the age of their perpetrator," District Attorney Lacey said. "It also gives prosecutors another tool to use to encourage undocumented victims of juvenile crime to help us bring their offenders to justice."

Because the criminal records of juvenile offenders are confidential, their victims have been unable to receive a U- or T- visa, as provided under federal law. These visas allow victims of human trafficking and other crimes to remain and work temporarily in the United States, if they have assisted in the investigation or prosecution of their case.

Prosecutors must review juvenile records to verify the victim of a juvenile offender meets the U-visa requirements, but currently that cannot be done because the records are sealed.

Assembly Bill 2321 would permit judges and prosecutors limited access to sealed juvenile records in order to certify a victim's helpfulness in an application for a U- or T- visa.

The bill, authored by Assemblyman Reggie Jones-Sawyer (D-Los Angeles), is awaiting Governor Gavin Newsom's final approval by September 30.

AB 2321 was inspired by the denial of a U-visa request made by the family of a child molestation victim. The juvenile court ordered the file sealed and prosecutors were prevented from accessing records to verify the applicant was a helpful victim of the qualifying criminal act.
